Erin confirmed her decision almost immediately. “The first class I took was one of the most challenging because it involved both communication theory and rhetoric, but I loved it. It was my most engaging course, and engagement is what this major is all about.”

Her experiences in the major included a unique study abroad course in Eastern Europe, where Erin spent time in Prague and Krakow. “The class was focused on communication and the Holocaust. It was so interesting because we examined the public relations work that has gone on there. Ordinarily, PR is concerned with shaping future perceptions, but in the case of the exhibitions there, it was focused on the past. That really expanded my perspective.”

With the help of her professors, Erin has landed several internships. For example, she worked with a local fitness chain. “I developed and managed that company’s entire presence on social media.”

A paid internship with a local marketing firm involved working with several of that company’s clients. “That’s a very important thing about communication. You become an essential piece connecting different industries, and that suits me. This major has taught me how to network. I’ve met incredible professionals and our department’s advisory council is amazingly influential with executives from CNN, General Motors, Google and Thompson Reuters.”

Ultimately, says Erin, “I’ve learned so much and been able to develop so many important skills. I think communication is a major for anyone who truly wants to succeed.”
