Ben Simpson knows these things. He feels that the German major fits nicely with many other disciplines. "I'm also a history minor, and I recently took a class on the Inquisition in history. At the same time, I was taking a class entitled Mystery Thrillers in German Culture. For the final project in the German class, I wrote a short mystery and ended up taking one of the lessons from the Inquisition course and adapting it into my story. To me, it was cool to see how you can mix things, and German really lends itself to that."

What impresses Ben the most about the department is its faculty. "The professors are phenomenal. If I don’t catch them in their offices, I’ve never gone more than two hours without a response to an email. They really are supportive and bend over backwards to make sure that their students do well and that they’re excited."

One of the best courses he's taken in the major, Ben says, was a conversation class. "I had pretty good proficiency in German when I came to the College, but I wasn't fluent. In that class, we had to do speeches every week right up in front of everyone. The professor was a taskmaster. He didn’t let anyone slide on homework and he made sure we were practicing and studying. He forced his students to use the language, so you became more comfortable with it pretty quickly."

During his sophomore year, Ben spent a semester in Bamberg, Germany, studying at one of the College’s sister schools. He says he’d recommend that kind of immersion experience to anyone interested in German – or any other language, for that matter.

So where will his major take him? "When you major in German, you don’t have to become a German teacher. German is one of the most important languages for people doing business throughout the world. If you’re interested in business, translation, international politics, pretty much anything, you should check out this major because German is super versatile."
